WHITE HOUSE CLERKS THROUGH WITH THRU

The White House is through with "thru" and all the rest of the simplified words put into the executive vocabulary by President Roosevelt, and the clerical force of the highest governmental office has gone back to the good old English of our fathers. For several weeks after the Roosevelt regime was ended the clerks and stenographers of the executive offices would occasionally "rite" "tho" for though, "past" for passed and "thoro" for thorough, as they were required to do under the administration that ended March 4. These words would perhaps be detected by some other clerk before they reached the government printing office, or, if they got as far as the G. P. O., they would be caught and changed by the proofreaders down there. None of them ever found their way into public print after the Taft administration got well into harness, and no one, except perhaps some few Roosevelt enthusiasts, are left to mourn their absence.

Thousands of dollars will be saved annually by the disuse of the simplified spelling, said an official of the government printing office. "It was the continual mix-up and eternal change that cost so much. For instance, the President would send down a message written in his peculiar abbreviated phonetic style. 'We would have to set it up as we got the copy. In due time the message would have to be printed in the Congressional Record, and as Congress had passed a law prohibiting the expenditure of any money for the simplified spelling, when we put it in the Record we had to spell the words according to common usage. So the messages had to be set up all over again, and as President Roosevelt was not at all stingy with his communications there was plenty of work of that sort to be done. Now, thank goodness, all the spelling that comes to the office is alike."
